Would you like to be part of a research group?

The University of Queensland's Centre for Online Health (COH) aims to provide better healthcare and strengthen communities by using telehealth and digital technologies such as video appointments and remote monitoring alongside traditional in-person care. We believe the success of any health service relies heavily on the satisfaction of patients and consumers. As the end user of the service, and perhaps someone with lived experience in specific health conditions, you have valuable insight into what makes a service patient centred.

We are recruiting participants to set up our Telehealth Group!

Our questions for you:

What should the group name be?

What topics do you think should be prioritised in Telehealth research?

Future Involvement opportunities

Join the Telehealth Group

Who

We invite anyone who has an enthusiasm for health services, is keen to contribute to improving telehealth service delivery and want to experience cutting-edge health technology.

How

Online or in-person meetings, newsletters and email updates, attending training and groups sessions. Some activities will be remunerated.

What

Attending our Centre advisory meetings; consulting on research projects; setting research priorities; reviewing research materials, including flyers, posters, and brochures; participating in funding applications for research projects; sampling new health technologies.

Why

Your input will help inform our research processes, such as what outcomes we choose. Ultimately, we wish to include outcomes that are important and beneficial to consumers in the long-term.

Where

We are based in Brisbane, but those living outside Brisbane or interstate are more than welcome to join in on the conversation via video call. Don't worry, we will provide all the support you need to connect!

And

We would also like to gain insight from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander individuals and culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) individuals to understand how services can be more culturally appropriate.
